Oh, happy Rose, what freamest thou So near my lady a face? Surely, thy paradles if wou, for never, neath the golden sun. Could life immortal bediegun. In fairer, sweeter place.

Would I were thee, on happy flower,
So near my lady fair!
My petal-lips could only speak
In kisses on that dainty cheek,
For words, at best, are poor and weak,
Where love is rich and rare!

A pretty home wedding of the week was that of Miss Nannie May Davis and Mr. Sam S. Shelby, which was celebrated last Wednesday evening at 7:20 at the residence of the bride's uncle and guardian, Mr. W. H. Davis, Fifty-fifth and Oak streets. The arrangement of flowers and nalms within the house was unusually beautiful, the partor all in white roses and carnations and the library and dining room in pink roses and white carnations. The Rev. Dr. Blackwell, of St. Louis, former pastor of the Westport Baptist church, awaited the bride and groom in the parior. Just before the well, of St. Louis, former pastor of the Westport Baptist church, awaited the bride and groom in the parlor. Just before the appointed hour, Miss Nelle Lucas, daintily gowned in pink and white organdie, seated herself at the plane and sang to her own accompaniment that favorite song of all brides. "O. Fromine Me."

At the close of the song Miss Lucas played the wedding march and the bride and groom came down the stairs and, entering the parlor, stood before a screen of palms during the impressive service and the reception which followed. The bride wore a beautiful gown of white satin duchesse the bodice draped with a bertha of rare duchesse point outlining a yoke composed of soft frills of monseithe de soie. Her bouquet was of bride roses, Miss Margaret Davis, sister of the bride served punch in the library, Her frock was a girlish one of pink slik veiled in organdie. HOW SHE GOT THE JOB.

She Was Too Pretty to Be Allowed to Go to Bullion, the Banker.

From the Cleveland Leader.

She was as beautiful as a dream and as frail as the dawn.

But Horatio Everingham was not in a genial mood. He had arisen with a headache and everything seemed to go wrong at the store that morning. Only five minutes before the sweet young woman entered one of the firm's oldest customers had left in anger, and declared that he would in future buy all his goods from a rival house.

house.

"Well," said the old gentleman, as she stood with downcast eyes before him, "I suppose you've called in answer to my advertisement for a typewriter, have you?"

"Yes, sir," she demurely refiled.
"I have already engaged one, he went on, "Sorry you didn't get here a little earlier. The fact is I hired the first applicant that came, for I concluded that a person who would not get here early enough to beat the others who might want the place wouldn't be likely to be very prompt in getting around if I were to employ her.

"I should have been here carlier," shesaid, "If I had not first gone to see Mr. Bullion, the banker. He also advertised for a typewriter. I am sorry now that I didn't come here first. Then I should probably have beaten all the others.

While she had talked Horatio Everingham had taken his first good look at her, and he, too, was sorry that she had gone to see Bullion first. But there was no use regretting what had been done. He didn't need her now; so there was nothing to do but let her go. He arose to show her out of the private office, but she hesitated.

"You don't think you'd need two typewriters, do you?" she said, at last.

"No," the merchant prince replied rather impatiently. "One can do the work very easily. Good morning."

"Well, then," she murmured, half to her-"Well," said the old gentleman, as she

"No, the mercane per the work very impatiently. "One can do the work very easily. Good morning."

"Well, then," she murmured, half to herself. "I suppose I shall have to accept Mr. Bullion's offer. I'm sorry, for I'd rather Bullion's offer. I'm sorry, for I'd rather work here."

"What:" exclaimed Mr. Everingham, "you're going to work for Bullion?"

"Yes. I told him I'd come back if you didn't want me."

"Stay here, my girl, stay here," said the old gentieman, while beads of cold swent stood out upon his brow. "I'd make room for you some way. Great Caesar, what a narrow escape! Why, all my money is in Bullion's bank."

"Look here, Aeneas." said Doctor Johnson, meeting the hero of the lost city of Troy. "what's the use of keeping the location of Troy a secret any longer?" "No use," said Aneas. "Where did you suppose?" "I supposed you'd be more at home on the Bobolinks," said Darwin. "I hear you and Mrs. Socrates are going to the seashore for the hot spell," said Alcibiades to the sage. "Not we we're going to stay home," replied Socrates. "There's a deadlock. Xanthippe says we shan't go to the mountains, because I've had too much hemlock already, and I won't go to the seashore, because she's got more sand than she needs as it is." "Your majesty," said Sir Walter Raleigh to Queen Elizabeth. "I am writing a sonnet to you." "Indeed" said the queen, pleased. "Yes," said Raleigh: but I am very much perplexed. For the sake of my poem would you allow me to seem to be disrespectful in just one line? I speak of you as the finest queen there is, and now you speech is full of fixz, and then my rhymes give out, unless your royal highness will let me allude to you as Liz. May I?"

After the Battle.

From the Washington Star.

A Washington lawyer's life is not lively without agreeable features, aitho possibly the first syllable of that wore not always spelled f-s-e.

Recently one had as a client a vigue, unobtrusive young marketman vigue, and conducted a market gar, somewhere beyond the city limits. It see that the young tellow had some trous with his father-in-law, a meddlesome of man who had always imposed on the hubands of his daughters, and after it wo over he came to consult the attorned whom he had known for a long time.

"Um-um," said the altorney thoughtfully, after hearing part of the story, "your father-in-law charged you with treating your wife harshly?"

"Yes, sir." was the answer.

"What did you do?"

"No, to him."

"I denied the charge from start to finish and so did she,"

"What did you do?"

"What did you do?"

"Hit him one-just one, sir."

"What did he do then?"

"Nothing, sir. The doctors did the rest."
